

Thurber

A Worden Fable:

The Bookworm & The Owl

"I need a chair. I can't lay on this table forever," complained the Bookworm. "Try sharing a shelf," the Owl replied. "We must find the perfect chair," they concluded.

"I will search from my perch," the Owl offered. "I will inch along the ground. It should be a cinch," claimed the Bookworm.

The Bookworm sighted a leg to climb. Upon careful inspection, he noted that it was one of four oval-shaped legs that formed (along with four stretchers) a steel base covered in epoxy powder. "This chair frame is quite right with its gentle slant. I will report to the Owl."

The Owl sighted a seat from afar. He flew closer to observe. "Well, how clever, a molded plyform seat and back." He recognized (because of his experience with trees) that it was available in either oak or maple. "Hmmm, distinctive black buttons and sculpted silhouette. I must report to the Bookworm."

The Bookworm and the Owl shared their exciting finds. When they realized they had both found Thurber, the Bookworm and the Owl were quite content.

As they say, after you search high and low, you will know Thurber is the perfect chair.
